The figure is monumental and sculptural; her strength and vitality embodied in a build-up of energy in her body mass. Her presence is conveyed through strength of form and articulation of her body. Whilst her face is treated with reserve, her expression reflects an inner radiance and beauty.

Drawing and sculpture were separate practices for Moore. The drawings helped establish Moore's reputation and were widely seen as complementary presences in their own right. In the 1930's drawing became a central practice not just as a preliminary to sculpture, and the word 'drawing' gradually became less than adequate to describe these works which became recognized by the critics as pictorial art by the end of the 1930's. As a draughtsman, pictorial artist, or perhaps even painter as he should properly be thought of at this point in his career, Moore was able to work fast with ideas flooding onto the paper, ideas relating to sculpture but which he elaborated and embellished with detail that was essentially pictorial. During the 1930's pictorial art gave free range to his imagination more readily than sculpture. Pictorial art could reflect on the human condition by means of narratives developed through interaction of internal parts in a way that single-object sculpture could not.

Life drawings extend to the early 1930s, but are rare later on, were generally made on larger sheets. 'I find drawin...
