As Douglas Cooper discusses in The Work of Graham Sutherland, 'In the postwar period Sutherland emerges as a much more interesting, varied and impressive artist. For he has developed his vision, polished his handling and pressed on from being an unusual English landscape painter to his present position as the leading representative of the English School.... He is adventurous in so far as he is always trying to break new ground and exposing himself to new experiences. But as he gains in technical accomplishment during the process the perfectionist in him is aroused and, becoming aware of the incompleteness of his earlier treatment of a motif, he turns back to redefine it and enlarge his original visual experience. A typical example of this is Entrance to a Lane which Sutherland had explored very fully in 1939 but to which he returned in 1945 to extract from it a more complex, sinuous and suggestive composition.... The time had come by 1945 when his vision was ready to expand and his style to be enhanced.... This change occupied a period of about four years and affected every aspect of his work - subject, colour, composition and handling. Sutherland extended his field of vision laterally and dealing with a bolder but more complex group of inter-related natural forms.... He gives up receding perspectives and brings these natural forms closer to the eye and the centre of the canvas. This change in Sutherland's approach to nature and in his handling is also accompanied by a change in his palette. His tonalities are lightened and he began to use much brighter colours, and he reveals himself as a vivid colourist with an original and personal sense of the sharp black and white oppositions, and has recourse to acid pinks and mauve, light blue and orange, scarlet, emerald and chrome yellow.... He was at this time on...
