Description

From John Ogilby's, 'Britannia, an Illustration of the Kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales'. First published in 1675 it remains the greatest advance in the mapping of England between the sixteenth-century surveys of Christopher Saxton and the county surveys of the second half of the eighteenth century. It was the first national road-atlas of any country in Western Europe and a landmark in the mapping of England and Wales. Strip map Islip to Bramyard, on a scale of approximately one inch to the mile, Britannia was the first atlas on a uniform scale. A fine early example from the second edition of 1675. The strips are treated as trompe l'oeil scrolls with the tops and bottoms furling over themselves behind, the curve shaded with hatching. The map includes fine detail, with hills depicted pictorially and with small illustrations to mark the sites of churches, windmills and country seats. More useful, perhaps, is the insertion of the number of miles travelled along the route, as well as various notes, such as 'a Wooden bridge over a dike' and roads to nearby villages and towns such as 'to Burford'.

The map also includes a miniature town plan of Worcester. Central cartouche inscribed 'The Continuation of ye Road from LONDON to ABERISTWITH. His modern reputation is based on his final career, started in his sixty-sixth year, as a publisher of maps and geographical accounts. Ogilby was born outside Dundee, in 1600, the son of a Scottish gentleman. While he was still a child, the family moved to London. When the elder Ogilby was imprisoned for debt, the young John invested his savings in a lottery, won a minor prize, and settled his father's debts. Unfortunately, not enough money was left to secure John a good apprenticeship; instead, he was apprenticed to a dance master. Ogilby was soon dancing in masques at court but, one day, while executing a particularly ambitious leap, he landed badly. The accident left him with a permanent limp, and ended his dancing career. However, he had come to the attention of Thomas ...
